Dr. Ashley Oliphant is an Associate Professor of English at Pfeiffer University, a private liberal arts institution in Misenheimer, N.C. For the past six years, Oliphant has also directed the Francis Center for Servant Leadership, a proud longtime partner of the North Carolina Campus Compact and the Bonner Foundation. She has been a service-learning practitioner for more than a decade, using her first-year writing courses to explore a series of diverse themes, including animal welfare, advocacy and mentoring. As the Faculty Fellow for the Francis Center, she tracks the university’s service-learning activities and supports faculty as they discover new pedagogical approaches. Oliphant was also the institutional writer for Pfeiffer’s latest Carnegie reclassification and of the university’s President’s Higher Education Community Service Honor Roll applications. She has been a presenter at the NCCC Pathways to Achieving Civic Engagement conference, often with her undergraduate students, since 2009.

Before coming to Pfeiffer, Oliphant served as a teaching assistant at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte and the University of North Carolina at Greensboro, where she received her doctorate in 2007. She has tutored in the Writing Center at UNCG, completing a term as the Assistant Director in 2004, and in the Writing Resources Center at UNCC. Oliphant teaches freshman composition and argumentation, language theory and American literature courses, specializing in literary modernism and the work of Ernest Hemingway. Her doctoral dissertation, Hemingway’s Mixed Drinks: An Examination of the Varied Representation of Alcohol across the Author’s Canon, offered a formalistic re-examination of alcohol as a theme in his work. Her new book, Shark Tooth Hunting on the Carolina Coast, is now available from Pineapple Press.
